For re-encoding or something on the other hand, some loss in quality can be acceptable. Lossless encoding is important for high quality results (it doesn't matter much, though, for average and low quality). For lossy encoding (quantization) there's a range (for example, 50-90%) for which the results are good enough for the purpose. A: After Effects CS5 has a built in "Processing" panel for applying different colour temperatures (you don't need an external plugin for this). Open the panel, go to the "Color" tab and then go to the "Processor" section. If you scroll to the right you will see a "Film" setting at the bottom of the panel. Highlight this and then click "select". After this all the colours of your images will be changed in proportion to the colour temperature. This colour temperature setting is only active in the "Processing" panel and does not touch the RGB values of your footage. It will not matter which DVCPRO50 footage you process, it will simply interpret all footage as "film". As it says in the 'FAQs' tab of the panel: How does the Post Processing menu relate to the Color Processing panel? Post Processing refers to your Post Production color correction tools. The color processing functions in the Processing tab of the Color panel are also available in Adobe After Effects. Since the colour controls are pretty much the same, this means you can switch back and forth between colour temperature changes made in post production and changes made in after effects. .key_label { display: inline-block; width: 1em; } .key_label { text-align: center; padding: 0.5em; color: white; font-family: 'Fira Sans', sans

February 3, 1983. Rehearing Denied April 1, 1983. *35 Lesa C. Johnson, Houston, for appellant. Carl B. Taylor, Houston, for appellees. Before EVANS, WARREN and DOYLE, JJ. OPINION DOYLE, Justice. This is an appeal by the Houston Police Department from an interlocutory order partially granting a motion to dismiss filed by the appellee, the City of Houston. On July 29, 1980, the Houston Police Department shot and killed a man named Walter Reuben Lewis. The following day Helen Goodman and her son, Steven, filed suit in district court against the Houston Police Department, the City of Houston, five police officers, and the deceased, for the wrongful death of Walter Reuben Lewis. The petition alleged that the defendants had violated Lewis' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights and his rights under art. I, Sec. 9 of the Texas Constitution. The defendants filed separate answers and special exceptions. A hearing on appellees' motion to dismiss was held on January 21, 1982, and a final judgment was signed on February 13, 1982. On February 18, the trial court entered an order granting the appellees' motion to dismiss the suit against the Houston Police Department. *36 Appellant contends the trial court erred in ordering a dismissal of the suit against the Houston Police Department because the Texas Tort Claims Act, Tex.Rev.Civ.Stat. Ann. art. 6252-19 (Vernon Supp.1982-1983), does not permit a suit for damages against
